

A few days ago, a student asked us why we decided to open Dallington School. It was clear to us; we wanted to create a school in which every child felt happy; a safe place full of affection and respect, where we helped them to get the best of themselves.

Dallington School is just that. It is a place where you breathe love, trust, and respect. We strive every day to provide an education that suits our students. There are many things that we had and continue to be clear about, which guide us daily in our work at the school:

*We know that each child learns in a different way.
We know that there are different intelligences and that all of them are fundamental.
We know of the demanding and competitive future that our students will face.
We know that the first years are fundamental in the formation of personality and self-esteem.
We know that the happiest people are those who are good and help others.
We know the impact that healthy habits from a young age have on the future health of each one of us.*

Taking all this into account, we are aware of our responsibility and duty:

To form a team of professionals, who have a positive vision of each student, who adapt their methodologies and ways of assessing each child, who are creative, good, and committed people.

To help our students to get to know themselves, to discover their strengths, to enhance them, but also to be humble.

To provide a place with strong values, where our students are aware of how lucky they are, and the realities beyond our immediate environment.

We want to help them to be good people, supportive and committed citizens.

To offer a healthy environment based on two pillars: organic food and sport from the early years.

We expect the best from our students. We want our students to be hard-working and demanding with themselves.

We want to help them set goals and achieve them, knowing that they can do it with effort, work capacity, perseverance, and enthusiasm.

We had a dream and thanks to the families who trust us every day, we have made it come true. We are happy and proud of the Dallington educational community. It is a huge responsibility and joy to lead this great project and help so many children to discover and develop their full potential, so that they too can be happy and fulfil their dreams.
